

<http://www.theweeklyconstitutional.com>

Global sperm counts dropping!!!!

One in five young men in the world between the ages of 18-25 are producing abnormal sperm counts, with many of their rare seed of very poor quality)only an estimated 5-15% of their sperm are good enough to be classified as "good" by the standard of the World Health Organization. When compared to the 90% range of "good" sperm found in other mammals, the large amount of breeding males shooting bad seeds makes you wonder what's in store for our species in the coming futures. And like a bad Clive Owen sci-fi thriller come to life, scientist have come out to make bad worse...

Recent studies on the sperm samples of young males 18-25 have found that 15-20 % have a sperm count of 20m of sperm cells per milliliter of semen. Similar survey taken in the forties found a sperm cell count of well over a 100m per milliliter. An 80% drop in roughly 70 years... that's rather alarming, don't you think?

This drop has not gone unnoticed... not in the scientific community anyway...

A survey done in 1991, with its results presented to the World Health Organization (to warn them of this disturbing trend twenty years ago) by Danish scientist professor Niels Skakkebaek (of the University of Copenhagen). In his study, Prof. Skakkebaek found that sperm count levels were at 60m per milliliter, 40m lower than those found in the 40's.

Prof. Skakkebaek's concern was that the declining trend would seem to indicate that men were on a path to becoming completely infertile within a few generations (although recent studies suggest the fall in sperm counts may have bottomed out).

While no one is sure as to exactly why our seed seems to have lost its punch, many experts believe that a growing number of males developing various forms of testicular dysgenesis syndrome (a condition which effects the reproduction system) might have something to do with the growing issues. TDS is being blamed on a number of environmental and cultural causes- everything from exposure to chemicals to recent trends towards wearing tight fitting pants and underwear- as to the reason for the ever lowering sperm counts in men the world over.

"It's most likely a reflection of the fact that many environmental and lifestyle changes over the past 50 years are inherently detrimental to sperm production," says Professor Richard Sharpe, fertility research expert at the Medical Research Council. "It may be that different factors come together to have a combined effect."

A thought on this...

So at what point do we, as a people, start connecting the dots...

Environmental causes, chemical exposure, and wearing your Fruit of the Loom a bit too tight. These are the things the best and brightest among us have concluded is the root cause to what seems to me like the extinction of our species in the next twenty years (given that sperm counts continue to drop at this same level of an average of 20%). And what's worse is that it's not like "yes. these things are the causes..."... it's this wishy washy "well I guess these things could be causing it but then again..." dribble that sounds more like them being bored by our pedestrian problems than them giving us a legit cause and solution for those problems we find ourselves in.

And how exactly does chemicals, environmental causes, and cultural things like underwear cause sperm counts to lower in places outside of the Western world where these things would apply (in theory).

Somehow this theory does not seem to work...

But worry not folks... I know what's behind this strange biological phenomenon...

It is the ongoing effects of a vast global network intent on limiting the world's population to a ceiling of 500,000 people worldwide.

Or to put it more bluntly, the lowering sperm counts in healthy males is the result of efforts made by the New World Order types (like, for example The Illuminati) to limit the global population to a more manageable number (believed to be around 500,000 people worldwide).

Now hear me out...

Using "chemtrails" (the rumored vapor trails running behind airplanes believed to be loaded with toxins by nefarious forces), the NWO guys are sending down either a mist of an unknown toxin (say something that would slowly begin to lower our sperm counts as a people) or perhaps an aerosolized tank of nano-bots programmed to enter the human bodies and attack us at a cellular level to an unsuspecting populous. The population is then slowly "breed out", as only the strongest sperm cells will have any shot of achieving their intended goal of fertilization. Within a few more generations, humans would lose the ability to make more of themselves, leaving the power to populate the world however they see it to the NWO groups running things.

Combine the diminished reproduction ability with the predicted food and water famines expected in the next few years, and the seeds for a massive population drop is all but set; thus achieving the centuries long goal of whatever "Masters of the Universe" group is behind this latest assault on the free people of this world...

Then again, I am a bit paranoid...